Birds Flying Away

Each year, many birds fly from one place to another together in a large group. This is known as migration*.

Birds in the Northern Hemisphere* usually move from the north to the south when they migrate* for winter. There are many reasons for this. First, the weather gets cold in winter and it's difficult for birds to live in cold weather. Second, birds need to find food. There is less food in the cold winter of the Northern Hemisphere.

Birds also migrate because they need to build a good home for their family. In spring, most birds fly back north for summer because the weather is warm and the days are longer there. Baby birds eat a lot, and there are more plants and insects to eat in the north when it's warm outside.

Some birds fly a very long way when they migrate. For example, smaller birds, like the Arctic tern*, travel thousands of kilometers every year. Migration can be dangerous for birds, too. Bad weather and other animals can kill them when they migrate. But birds know they must make this trip every year to stay alive.

*migration—渡り

*the Northern Hemisphere—北半球

*migrate—(鳥が) 渡る

*the Arctic tern—キョクアジサシ
